At Brighton Beach, New York's famous summer resort, a winter bathing pool has been constructed on the beach. The sea water is let into the enclosed pool and heated. A glass roof and sides keep out the chilly air and a restaurant at the side and a huge fireplace, make sea bathing in winter anything but uncomfortable.

"Zellgewebentzündung"
Is Kaiser's Affliction

London, Eng., Dec. 22.—An official message received here from Berlin describes emperor William's illness as "Zellgewebentzündung" (more frequently given as "Hindgewebentzündung").

An authoritative medical journal calls the disease "cellulitis" and describes it as follows:
"Inflammation of cellular or loose connective tissue, chiefly subcutaneous, but also of that between muscles and viscera, or surrounding various organs. It is characterized by the same spreading or toxic character as erysipelas, and is circumscribed and diffuse. The swelling is marked early by branching lines of lymphangitis. Pain is tense and great, and the absorbent glands and vessels are often inflamed. Constitutional symptoms are grave. The disease is often mild in degree, and the lymphatics may dispose of the poison and suppuration fail to occur."

UNCENSORED WAR NEWS
New York, Dec. 22.—Miss Helen Keller and other blind persons in the United States are obtaining uncensored news from the capitals of belligerent nations in Europe in newspapers published for the blind in London, Paris, and Vienna, according to Miss Keller.

These newspapers are not censored, she says, because they are printed in short hand Braille, a point tip used for the blind which the censors are unable to read.

Clever Acting Wins
Them Juicy Prize

John and Stanley, New Mutual Cublets.

Thirty days after they had first seen the light of day John and Stanley, lion cubs of the great Bostock collection of trained animals which appear in David Horsley's Centaur Feature animal pictures released on the Mutual program, were pressed into service as motion picture actors. Despite their youth and inexperience, John and Stanley performed like veterans. They snarled and scratched and, as temperamental stars are prone to do, took exception to all things going on around them. Captain Jack Bonavita, who is in charge of the training of the Bostock animals, was so delighted with their acting that he rewarded each with a juicy portion of beef.

HERE'S A WOMAN WHO ENJOYS BEING A SERVANT

But Everybody Only Laughs at Her—
She is "Coddles" in "A Pair of Sixes."

It is quite a surprise, having seen and laughed at Coddles, the patient, pursuing Coddles, in "A Pair of Sixes," whose unreciprocated affection for the masquerading butler in this new and joyous farce is one of the striking farcical features, to find that in real life she is a very charming young lady and the exact antithesis of her stage character.

During the long run of "A Pair of Sixes" at the Longacre Theatre, New York it aroused general comment that while "Coddles" in her "working hours" during the time she was on the stage and most before the eyes of the public was a slave and one of the most woe-begone creatures of the modern stage, when she passed out of the stage door and took up her real life apparently had given more care to her costume than any other woman player on Broadway.

It is told that the quaint drawing of the character has been such that the player naturally feels that she must take more than the usual feminine care of her appearance when she is off the boards to offset the painfully unattractive appearance of "Coddles."

As soon as the interviewer settles down for a talk with Coddles it is discovered she has a grievance. She voices it immediately. The grievance is a very human one, and she is commiserated for it at once for it might affect anyone and particularly an actress to whom the remembrance of the public is a cherished thing. It is that notwithstanding all the study she has given in years gone by, and all the roles in which she has been well received by the public for years that she has been featured since her debut on Broadway in "A Pair of Sixes," as having but one claim on the public mind, and that is her ability to hit the back of her head on the unfeeling boards of the stage, upper left center and the audience's bump of humor at one and the same time.

She goes to a nearby receptacle and extracts a clipping from her home paper, one of the New York correspondent's letters which is headlined "Stage Flop Makes an Actress," and ignoring her obvious claims to praise on account of the clever piece of character work which she has given, harps throughout the article on the one note of that a stage trick, quite popular in the days when, if an actor could not gain the applause of the public in any other way, he could always take a tumble and so make a ten strike.

This clipping has been followed by expostulatory letters from her family and friends, who have been shocked at the idea of her turning handsprings or something of the sort, which is the character you would assign to her after reading this and a lot of other criticism, so-called.

"Coddles" is perfectly right in stating that the noted fall is but a very small part of her character role, which from start to finish is a cleverly thought-out, admirably acted piece of theatrical work.

Edward Peple, the playwright, stated that "Coddles" had made more of the part than he had put into it, a not uncommon surprise to many playwrights, one would judge, but when you come to talk it over you discover that her personal translation of it has been more along the physical than the psychological lines. For in answer to the question as to whether she thinks, in these enlightened days, there are women even in "Coddles" class who worship so unreservedly and with such scant returns, "Coddles" looks slightly perplexed, as if she had not given that part of the subject much thought, and then digs from the inner recesses of her mind a single instance of a middle-aged woman who was so in love with a man that she hounded him with presents and attentions. The man was an actor and of course cannot be judged by ordinary standards, being so far above the commonplace man in attractions; so poor "Coddles" is still left unexplained, psychologically.

But from the other angle, "Coddles" talks unreservedly. Her turn for dialects, if not the absolute reason for her success in character work, has helped immeasurably. To the Canadian born came all sorts and kinds of "help," immigrants from Yorkshire, Lancashire, Scotch and Irish girls newly landed preserving intact all the peculiarities of their native tongue. The family circle also numbered some friends from the old country whose brogue was captivating enough to emulate.

"Coddles" and her sister soon became adept in imitations, and though in Cockney talk of "Coddles" would seem to have reached the top note of perfection, she says that her Irish brogue, her particular pride, while her sister could always beat her far and away when they came to discourse in Scotch. "I have always associated the right coiled hair, the wasp-like waist, the narrow shoulders with a woman of the 'Coddles' type whom we had work to us," she explains in answer to the interrogation concerning make-up costumes, "and determined that if I ever had an opportunity to duplicate the Sunday best I would do so. I have studied rigidly the dress of every class actor I had to represent, because I believe in the slightest details of the clothes the temperament is shown just as distinctly as in the gestures, intonations and silence."

It is a pity that some of the young American actresses could not take a lesson out of "Coddles" book and achieve real success by subordinating their physical attractions for a few years to the arduous work demanded by character parts which is, according to authorities, the only way of obtaining something besides a Paquin popularity of the discussions in connection with the bill providing for "A council of national defense" several times introduced in the house by congressman R. P. Hobson. The object of this bill was to secure the authorization of a council composed of the president, ex officio, chairman of certain important committees of the senate and house, the secretaries of state, war and navy, and some of their highest assistants. The council would consider the broad elements of a military policy for the United States and would recommend to congress the necessary measures to make it effective. The political departments of our government, representing, as they do, the people at large, must also, establish for the people, a military policy commensurate for their needs and the destiny of the nation. A more glance at our history will show that we never have had such a policy. Without such a policy any legislation for the national defense will be largely patchwork and in the end inconsistent with the national destiny.

ARTESIA NEEDS BIGGER PENS

FOR SHIPMENT OF CATTLE
Artesia, N. M., Dec. 23.—Larger stock pens are being demanded by the shippers from this valley who are forced to ship cattle out of here by using the already overgrown stock pens.

This is rapidly becoming a great cattle and sheep shipping center and the pens will have to be more than doubled in size to make room for these large shipments which are coming in almost daily from the valley and plains country.

A protest is to be filed with the railroad company against the inadequate pens and an effort made to have them enlarged at once.
